

Unlicensed medicines

Information for patients, relatives and carers

Introduction

You are being given this leaflet because a medicine you have been prescribed is not currently licensed in the UK.

This leaflet is being provided to help answer some of the questions you or those who care for you may have about your medication. It is not meant to replace the consultation between you and your medical team but aims to help you understand more about the treatments you discussed together.

Licensed medicines

To ensure medicines in the UK are safe and effective, they must conform to strict standards set by the Medicines and Healthcare Products Regulatory Agency (MHRA). When a medicine meets all the requirements and passes clinical trials it is given what is called a marketing authorisation (this used to be called a product licence). This means it can be legitimately used to treat particular medical conditions.

Unlicensed medicines

Sometimes your medical team will recommend you take a medicine that is not currently licensed in the UK. This is because they think the medicine is likely to be effective and the benefits outweigh any associated risk. The medicine may be unlicensed because:

- it does not have UK marketing authorisation, e.g. it may not be licensed in a formulation that you need
- no companies sell the medicine in the UK, or it is not classified as a medicine
- it is still going through clinical trials

Prescribing an unlicensed medicine

Your medical team will look at all the medical evidence available before prescribing an unlicensed medicine.

All medicines may have side effects. In the UK, all manufacturers must include an information leaflet which explains the effects of the medicine. If the medicine your medical team have given you is unlicensed, the leaflet may not be relevant to your condition or may not be written in English. They may then provide you with another leaflet or information sheet.

Always take your medicines as instructed on the label. If you have any concerns, talk to your medical team or pharmacist.

Refusing an unlicensed medicine

If your medical team prescribe an unlicensed medicine, it is because they are choosing a particular treatment for you, and they think this may be your best option. All the medical evidence will have been carefully considered. However, if you do not want to take the unlicensed medicine, please discuss your options with your medical team or pharmacist. With some unlicensed medicines you are required to give your consent in writing before you can start taking them. If you do agree in writing, you can still change your mind any time afterwards.

Finding out more about my unlicensed medicine

If the leaflet that comes with your medicine does not have information about your condition, please ask your medical team or pharmacist. If the information is in another language, an English translation will be provided if available. If there is no suitable leaflet relevant to your condition your medical team or pharmacist can put some information together for you. It's important that you have the information you need about your medicine. You can also ask your medical team or pharmacist for support groups and websites about your condition so you can find out more information.

Renewing your prescription

Usually, the hospital will prescribe your unlicensed medicine(s) and make sure you have a regular supply. If you do not know how to renew your prescription, check whether the hospital pharmacy will set up a regular repeat prescription for you, and make sure you have enough medication until your next visit.
